HAYNES International

Haynes International

- Located in LaPorte at 3238 IN-39, Haynes International is one of the world's largest developers and distributors of high-performance nickel and cobalt-based alloys for use in high temperature and corrosion applications.
- Haynes International currently maintains a total of approximately 22 U.S. published patents and applications and approximately 295 foreign counterpart patents and applications targeted at countries with significant or potential markets for patented products. A fact to note is that Haynes International alloys are used in jet engines, the Apollo Program, and other NASA projects. In addition, their alloys are used in the Space X Project. One of Haynes International most recent accomplishments has landed on the surface of Mars. Haynes 230 alloys was used in the creation of the Mars surface landing craft. Additional uses include other jets and aircrafts, satellites, and industrial heating equipment, critical components for today's space exploration.
- The company's history spans more than a century of products, processes, and most of all, people. Also developed, is the introduction of many well-known nickels and cobalt-based alloys that are used worldwide in the most demanding environments and critical applications for aerospace, power generation, chemical processing, pharmaceuticals and other areas. In 1884 when Elwood Haynes drove his "Pioneer" automobile down Pumpkinvine Pike in Kokomo, Indiana, it set in motion an inventive spirit. He was a tireless inventor who developed the unique metal alloys that led to the foundation of Haynes International in 1912, which in their commitment to alloy excellence inspired their tradition of innovation.
- Haynes International has manufacturing facilities in Kokomo, Indiana; Arcadia, Louisiana; Mountain Home, North Carolina; and La Porte, Indiana. The La Porte Indiana facility performs slitting, stretch leveling, blanking and cut to length operations to Haynes International and other customers.
- In addition to many monetary contributions within local community organizations, many of their employees also volunteer their time to serve those in the community.
- Haynes International encourages referrals of female, veteran, minority, or handicapped applicants. The company offers a full benefit package, 401K referral and attendance bonus, dental and eye care and shift premium bonus. To apply for a position at Haynes International, contact D. Koch, HR Director, at 219-326-8530 or visit their website at haynesintl.com/contact/careers.
